How Padlet was implemented in an Intro to 2D Digital Design Course Critique

Traditional Approach to Critiques

Traditional critiques would take place in the classroom with students mounting their physical work on the wall. Due to the structure of the computer lab and the size of the prints, viewing work could be difficult especially when observing the details within the work.

Another challenge with the traditional critique process was student participation during critiques. This participation was approached in two ways. First, students could write down critique comments on paper which would be anonymously read. Second, students could voluntarily raise their hands to verbally participate in the critique discussions. During these approaches, student participation was low and lacked substance.

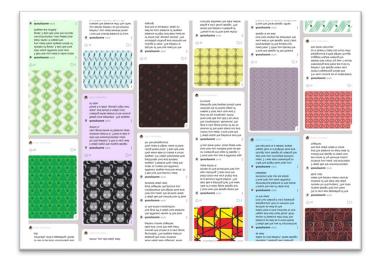

(Sample of traditional critique wall)

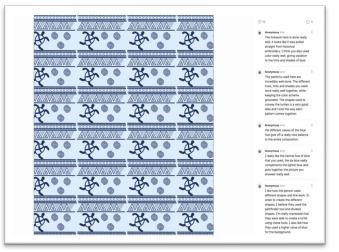

New Approach to Critiques

For the new approach to the critique process, the incorporation of Padlet was introduced in the first portion of the critique. Students were to post their digital files on the online Padlet Wall. Once all the files were posted students were encouraged to click through and view their peer's files at a larger scale. When all student's work was viewed students were given 10-minutes to post 2 comments incorporating vocabulary terms learned from the project. For this portion of the critique, students could remain anonymous when posting to encourage participation and feedback. Students were also encouraged to like different students' work by clicking the heart icon.

Once this process was complete the class could raise their hands to verbally ask questions to the designer regarding different sources of inspiration and what tools were used to create the design. The Padlet wall would also be displayed on the projector at the front of the classroom so students could reference which pieces were being discussed and then view them on their computer or device. This method increased student participation while actively engaging the students with their fellow peer's work.

For the last portion of the critique, students would then post their physical work on the wall and verbally reflect on where improvements in design, printing, and mounting could be made as well as the difference between viewing work digitally verse viewing work physically.

Conclusion when using Padlet during an Intro to 2D Digital Design Critique

In conclusion, Padlet is a wonderful resource that can be incorporated into any course in various ways. These implementations will be explored further next semester. Using Padlet during the critique process student participation did improve and discussions gained substance. Padlet could not replace the traditional form of the critique process due to the physical requirements of the course where printing and mounting needed to be evaluated.
